I- READING COMPREHENSION

A- THE TEXT

- 1- In the daily struggle to catch and hold pupils' attention, teachers in one region of Spain are getting a little help from the state. As of this month, a new law in Castilla-La Mancha prevents school children from bringing smartphones into classrooms.

- 2- For many schools in the region, the legislation simply gives legal support to rules they have had in place for years. Now, any pupil caught using their phones in class will face losing some break-time privileges or even detention. "The law is the result of teachers' complaints of constant interruptions in class as well as concerns about the use of phones to cheat," the head teacher of Fernando de Rojas state school said. "In recent years, with phones becoming part of teenagers' lives, teachers have also become worried about the increase of cyberbullying," he added. His school banned phones years ago, but pupils continue to sneak them in. "This law is a big help to what we're trying to do," he said.

- 3- In 2014, a study found that 94% of Spaniards between 16 and 35 had a mobile. 56% of pupils admitted using their phones during class despite bans. In the northern region of Galicia, authorities are debating whether a similar school wide ban on phones is needed, while many of them are taking it on themselves to take disciplinary action against mobiles in the classroom. But in the face of increasing prohibition, some are dealing with the issue differently. In the Torre Del Palau School, mobile phones have become part of the curriculum. "I guess it's better to join forces with the enemy here," the head teacher recently told teachers at a conference.
